George Eliot. For if some one, famishing for want and pressed with hunger, use human flesh as food - an extremity not unknown, as both ancient history and the unhappy experience of our own days have taught us - can it be contended, with any show of reason, that all the flesh eaten has been evacuated, and that none of it has been assimilated to the substance of the eater though the very emaciation which existed before, and has now disappeared, sufficiently indicates what large deficiencies have been filled up with this food.
